Irrelevant cool(?) fact(?) to fill up this blank space: Here in California (something something ophiolites???) pls help, owen) we have this rock(?) thing called serpentine (serpentinite??). Soils which contain large amounts of it have large amounts of certain chemicals which a lot of plants are not able to tolerate. The plants that are adapted to it have a monopoly over the place, so there ends up being really interesting types of plants in outcrops of serpentine(?) soil, (like Sargent Cypresses) which aren't found at many other places.
